Abstract :

My habilitation narrates my past ten years of dance-led research in Human-Computer Interaction and Interaction Design, where dance practice served as the experimental frame through which I designed and integrated interactive systems. I address two main questions:

- How does the integration of technologies in dance operate?
- What types of opportunities, understandings, tensions, and discourses emerge from such integration?

The habilitation emphasizes my epistemological journey from quantitative methodologies to research through practice to research-creation. These distinct methodologies allowed me to design a series of interactive systems spanning from generic ones for dance movement analysis to systems grounded in dance artists' practices and systems designed for my own personal choreographic work. This journey also involved progressively letting my personal subjective voice come through in my academic work.
